Mission and course content summary: to provide a high level practice of language skills within international political contexts while at the same time provide proof of the level of English required to work in an international organization context or the ability to follow a course of study at university level. The mission of this course is to explore some fundamental areas in English in political environments offering students the opportunity of develop and practice the skills they need in their future professional lives.

Course content

Activities, both written and spoke, are aimed at developing skills which are required to confront with ease the various topics analyzed in class. Particular attention is given to speaking and writing skills.

Reading list

All materials will be discussed and presented during the first lesson.

For non-attending students: students must be able to demonstrate their learned abilities the same as attending students. In addition, non-attending students must be prepared on the following two books:

- G. LAKOFF, Moral Politics – How Liberals and Conservatives Think.
- E. LONERGAN, Money, Acumen.

Teaching method

Face to face communications, language exercises, interactive class activities (role plays, political game situation and debate, forums, etc.) During class time, students also read updated materials and generate class discussions on international political topics. They spend much of their time on activities, simulations and role-plays as well as class presentations to help them identify effective language choices and enhance their ability to use English effectively.
