Description

Should art tell the truth or lie? Should art allow the audience to escape reality or to understand it better? Can a lie be truer than the truth? What is there behind an image, a character, a scenario, behind the many stories that millions of creative artists have imagined for us?

This interdisciplinary course explores the theme of ILLUSION and REALITY in different works of art to highlight its crucial importance not only in theatre, but also in fine arts, novels, opera and finally in cinema. ILLUSION is the very essence of the theatre as on stage everything appears 'as if' it is something else: a sort of deception that takes the audience back and forth in time, in distant locations real or imaginary. After a closer view, we discover that it is an essential element used to represent the world, to transform an ephemeral reality into a permanent and universal truth in any work of Art, not just on stage.

Each class is dedicated to a different masterpiece and will analyse different illusions in varied situations with their corresponding outcomes: comic, tragic and frightening. The key concepts that describe Illusions in art are: artifice, deception and seduction. The artifice tells us that every story is 'artificially' real, the deceptions reveal surprising and unexpected truths, and finally to rely on the illusion, to believe the deception, the audience needs to be 'seduced'. Illusions are present in many stories, described by powerful symbols and motifs such as masks and disguises, dopplegängers, dreams or nightmares, mirrors and other mysterious artifices to help us see beyond the eyes, within the illusions, in the deepest and remotest corners of our mind.
